Q: d3.js - stacking text labels, doesn't work I tried to stack my text labels using the following code: `d3.select('#labels').selectAll('text').data(labels).enter().append('text').style('fill','black').style('text-anchor','middle').text(d => d + '%').attr("x",((width/2) + (radius/2)));` The labels appears at the middle of the circle, but I want to stack them. It is a Waste management company based in Jamaica at Mona (Cooke Freeport). They were designed to serve the Greater Mona Area (coastal) and in the Greater Kingston Area. There has been a major push to find a long term solution for Jamaica's waste management and recycling. At this point in time there are many players involved in the efforts, but so far there is no one in Kingston who is providing the services to the community. A: What you're trying to do is called "reflection" and it looks like you've built a really good way to do it. When you try to post an image, you get this: The simple explanation for this is that you've used an URL that refers to images on a remote server. The URL is crafted to receive a large image, but the server only responds with an empty response. This is because the server only returns data if the request is made using an HTTP GET method. You need to move your.png image file to the same place where you're running the server, or access it by URL using the HTTP POST method. POST is the method of choice for uploading files. It's the most common way to use forms to upload files, and is much more tolerant of malformed data sent in the request body. Chemical degradation of lignin enhances the bioavailability of cobalt in the surface soil of abandoned railway-related industrial area and changes the biological availability of cobalt. The bioavailability of cobalt in soil varies among regions, and the rates of disappearance of radiotracers from soil during soil incubation and the chemical forms of the radiotracer in soil solution, which affects their bioavailability, vary according to land use. Understanding the chemical form of a radiotracer in soil is useful for predicting its bioavailability. We investigated the disappearance rate of Co from the surface soil of an abandoned railway-related industrial area and the factors associated with this rate using Co-99m. The rate of disappearance of Co-99m was faster than those of Co-59 and Co-63. Chemical extraction of the soil by NaOH and HCl solutions increased the rate of disappearance, whereas it was decreased by soil washing with PBS. The rate of disappearance was increased by soil incubation and decreased by artificial aging. The chemical form of Co-99m in the soil was changed in the presence of soil solution and by soil incubation and different incubation times. 3e33713323
