Treaty of Saint Petersburg The Treaty of Saint Petersburg was a treaty signed on 10 March 1809 at St. Petersburg, Russia and ended the war between France and the Russian Empire. Following the disastrous Russian defeats in Italy during 1805-1806, Tsar Alexander I came to the conclusion that France was a greater threat to Russia than a threat from Great Britain. On 5 January 1809, Alexander issued the manifesto for the campaign against France. Russia decided to remain neutral in the upcoming war and sent Pahlen to make a personal visit to Paris to gain reassurances that France was not planning to invade Russia. The French leaders were fully aware of Tsar Alexander I's reservations but Napoleon Bonaparte believed that it was his destiny to give Russia war or to end with his life. After long negotiations, a treaty was finally signed at St. Petersburg on 10 March 1809. During the negotiations, Alexander I had tried to highlight to the French the threat of Britain. However, Bonaparte overruled this and focused on pursuing a French version of 'Victor's peace'. The treaty stated that Russia ceded all its lands to Napoleon; Russia also became a French ally, to be 'bound by treaties and obligations' and it was made a member of the French empire. In addition, the Turks were persuaded to join the treaty and so France gained a political ally in Central and Eastern Europe.
