I have a listbox with a static number of items. When the user selects an item, another listbox with a dynamic number of items appears depending on a chosen index. To achieve this, I have a SelectedIndexChanged event on the main listbox that closes the second listbox on the first SelectedIndexChanged and reopens the second listbox on the second SelectedIndexChanged. If the user selects an item in the second listbox before the first SelectedIndexChanged, the second listbox remains open and the selected item is not removed when the user selects an item in the first listbox. Is there a better way to achieve this?

The game was developed by Jonathan Harris for Gasoline Games in 2003, and is currently published by Codemasters and published by 8th Ltd in 2010. The objective of the game is to escape from the prison, where the protagonist, Pinkie, has been sentenced for stealing 5 pounds of gas. As you can guess, you can control Pinkie in this game and you have to use the available physical objects to complete your mission. When you start the game you have 3 lives, and if you lose all of them, the game is over. You play the game by moving through the game levels, by jumping and getting the perfect timing, while avoiding the obstacles. You move your Pinkie through the levels by moving the Joystick. In each level, you are provided with different items that will help you to pass the level. These items will also be useful in later levels, and you can only have one in your inventory at any point. The first item you will use is an alarm clock, which starts up the motion sensors, and once you are standing on it, you are hidden from the guards. You can also use this item to create a simple jump pads and some shorter 6a5afdab4c
