Relative strength of the zygomatic arch among facial dimensions, and its significance in surgery of the craniofacial region. To determine the importance of the zygomatic arch, a strong and constant component of the facial skeleton, as a reconstructive tool in surgical procedures, the following analysis was performed on cadaveric bone specimens: (1) relative bone-bending strength of the zygomatic arch was compared with that of the frontal and parietal bones, (2) the contribution of the zygomatic arch to the overall facial stability was evaluated by comparing the strength of the zygomatic arch and of the malar arch, and (3) the stability of the zygomatic arch was investigated when the surgical dissection was performed parallel to the nasolabial fold, deep to the zygomatic arch, and deep to the malar arch. The results of this analysis demonstrated the strength of the zygomatic arch to be at least four times greater than that of the other facial bones. The contribution of the zygomatic arch to the stability of the facial skeleton was approximately 45 percent, which was comparable to that of the malar arch. Finally, the zygomatic arch proved to be the strongest part of the facial
