Wireless Local Area Networks (WLANs) are becoming very popular, particularly for carrying voice and data traffic in 802.11 networks. WLANs are a type of wireless communications system that allows mobile devices to connect to the Internet via access points. The access points form part of the wireless network infrastructure, and are also known as wireless nodes. Each access point is capable of communicating with mobile devices, which are known as wireless stations or "STA". Wireless connections are via radio frequency signals over the air. Each STA connects to its access point through the use of an antenna and radio hardware. STA communication with access points and other STAs is done using standardized protocols, and this has resulted in the IEEE (Institute of Electrical and Electronics Engineers) defining various wireless networking standards (such as 802.11 and 802.15). In a typical wireless network, wireless nodes are organized into an infrastructure network. A wireless node within the infrastructure network is defined to be a member of the infrastructure. Mobile nodes (such as STAs) are mobile units, and are defined to be in range of the network infrastructure. Each infrastructure STA communicates to a corresponding infrastructure AP. Each infrastructure AP has a corresponding access point assigned to it. This access point is defined to be a member of the infrastructure. An example of such an infrastructure network is shown in FIG. 1. For a STA to be located in the infrastructure network, the STA must be within range of an AP. In order to specify the range of the AP, a wireless node must be serviced by an AP. A STA must establish a communication session with an AP in order to communicate with the other STAs and access the Internet. The communication session between the STA and the AP is initiated by the STA sending an inbound data frame to the AP. The inbound data frame is a frame that is to be transmitted from the STA to the AP. The inbound data frame is typically defined to be a frame that is received by the STA as a response to a probe request frame sent from the AP to the STA. The AP first sends the probe request frame towards the STA. The STA then replies to the AP by sending the inbound data frame. The AP in a typical wireless network is known to be a STA. The AP and the STA are, however, two separate entities. The AP has a corresponding access point identity (IP address), and the AP is assigned a corresponding IP address. In other words, the AP is a distinct entity from the STA
