A case of angiosarcoma of the scalp arising after treatment with ^{60}Co radiation is presented. Other reported cases of angiosarcoma of the scalp have occurred after trichotrachotrophy or hair loss surgery. No case of an angiosarcoma occurring after radiation therapy, however, has been reported. The pathologic findings in the patient's tumor were typical of angiosarcoma. Previous radiation therapy may be a risk factor for the development of radiation-induced angiosarcoma in the head and neck region. All of us at My-Plate have worked hard to develop the MyPlate nutrition standards that will help people understand how to eat a nutritious, balanced diet. We've had hundreds of stakeholder meetings to help make sure people at the table have something to say about MyPlate and that people making food decisions have the right information. That said, sometimes the nutrition facts on food labels are confusing or too hard to understand, and people want more information than what a fact label tells them. MyPlate does a good job of highlighting the biggest food groups but leaves out the smaller ones (e.g., vitamins and minerals). This has led many stakeholders to suggest we also put health claims on food labels to tell people more about the specific nutrients in the foods they eat. As we've gone through many iterations of this over the past year, we've had some thought-provoking questions come up. Do we believe health claims can really help people choose healthier food? Do we really believe that putting nutrition facts on food labels can substitute for a health claim? Do we really believe that health claims would not, in fact, be interpreted as a substitute for nutrition facts on the label? Can we balance the needs for innovation and having industry make rules with food industry interests? Ultimately, many stakeholders agreed the answer to all of these is yes. However, that wasn't the easy answer. In fact, it was the most complicated question of all. So we looked to the scientists and scholars who are experts in the field. We asked them to imagine the world where a specific health claim would inform
