Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a medical delivery system for delivering fluids in the medical field. More particularly, the present invention relates to a connection between a catheter and a fluid source. 2. Description of the Related Art

The art of inserting catheters into vessels and other cavities of the human body is well developed. There are numerous catheter types which are commercially available. For example, catheter tubing and dilators, which are inserted into and through a vein to guide and/or place a catheter, are routinely used for a wide variety of applications, including intravenous feeding, transfusions, medications, dialysis, and others. Fluid transfer devices are often provided with a catheter tube. There is commonly a need to supply fluids, such as nutrients, medications, or other fluids, to the body of a patient with the catheter. In the prior art, various delivery systems have been devised for such purposes. The term catheter delivery system is intended to include infusion systems, such as parenteral fluid infusion devices and other devices for supplying fluids to or monitoring patients. In general, the majority of catheter delivery systems are designed for use with a syringe to deliver fluids to a patient.

Unfortunately, syringes are complex devices that are difficult to master. Syringes require the user to actuate a plunger to force a specified amount of fluid from the syringe into a hub, which is the inlet to a catheter tube or a port. Any mistakes in the amount of fluid delivered can lead to clinical problems, so nurses must be particularly careful when using a syringe. Such care takes time and may result in decreased throughput. Other types of fluid delivery devices include simple fluid sources, which may be any of a variety of valves for injecting fluids. In these devices, a fluid source, such as a bottle or bag, is connected to the catheter. These devices do
