A VPN is set up to provide confidential access to the outside world while the VPN user is connected to the Internet, or other VPN networks. This is done using a virtual network software such as Pidgin, or with the help of an encryption component. The user connection to the VPN server will occur via an Internet Protocol (IP) address that is often untraceable. Seeing as many VPN services allow file sharing, as well as gaming and torrenting, these are major issues to consider. Users will be required to trust the VPN service when downloading and installing it. This trust depends on a certain level of trust from the VPN service provider. For example, someone may just install the VPN services to gain access to geo-blocked content and then go about their business. If they don't trust the VPN service, they may also install the VPN services to gain access to other services, that the VPN service provider does not want them to access. These days, there are various methods through which internet usage can be tracked and monitored. Advanced monitoring tools can even make a detailed log of the user's internet activities. With the growth of information and connectivity, the online culture is changing at a staggering pace. Access to important information is now easy and instant – including information that should never be available publicly, such as personal details, confidential information, and even illegal material. In this digital era, location data (in the form of coordinates) can reveal some important information about the user. Proxies – Use a proxy to mask your IP address. While a Proxy is not required to connect to a VPN service, it can be a beneficial tool when you plan to mask your identity. It's a common misconception that a Proxy is used to unblock content. It is not used to unblock content but it can be used to unblock some content for those that have restricted access to content
