Q: What's the easiest way to transport layers of fibers? I would like to transport layers of fibers around - not just in and out of a glass furnace to be cut into windowpane sizes, but just as they are (usually, at least), out of a viscose or rayon spinning mill, and transported to spinning mills, finishing mills, and canvas loom installers for conversion into fabrics. If the fibers are dry, they're very compact, so I don't want to dilute them with water or other solvents, and certainly not expose them to air currents. So what's the simplest way to transport them? A: The first answer that comes to mind is bags made of biaxially oriented polyester film with a low permeability to oxygen. Tapes of this type are used to transport and store food products in ships for long voyages. In our environment, the best known example of
