PDF File ID-1EGBJ7GPDF-161.Q: Usage of new energy economy I am trying to understand an effect of new energy economy for the first time. While reading, I am always seeing the following sentence: Deployment of energy efficiency measures may require additional investment, such as building new energy efficiency facilities, adding energy efficiency technology to existing operations, and up-front financing of the new energy efficiency assets. I guess that new energy economy is a way to estimate the costs of new energy efficient measures. But why "may require" is there? If we want to construct new energy efficient facilities, is it true that these new facilities are not necessary? A: It is unlikely that a facility already exists that can meet the new demand of energy efficiency measures. The writer is trying to convey that even if the operating company builds new energy efficient facilities, they will still need to add the new energy efficient technology, and they may need to finance the new energy efficient assets, so the ratepayers will still be on the hook for a significant investment. Composite structure of GID1C The composite structure of GID1C is a protein with the domain architecture: Interaction domains of this protein GID1C is primarily localized in the cytosol. The protein localizes to the ER, endosomes and other membrane structures. GID1C possesses N-terminal WW domain, three tandem SAND domains, at the N-terminus, and eight tandem LisH domains at the C-terminus. The LisH domain (also known as the C-terminal LisH or Lamellipodin domain) is the most characterized protein-protein interaction domain in eukaryotic cells. It is found in many cellular proteins such as Lis1 and LIS1-associated factor-4 (LAF-4) and proteins that regulate the cytoskeletal organization. The LisH domains are classified into three subgroups based on sequence homology and known binding partners. GID1C contains four LisH domains which are LisH_4, LisH_5, LisH_6 and LisH_8.
