Electrophysiological evidence in the lateral superior temporal gyrus. A recently discovered functional specialization in the left lateral temporal cortex, an area of high spatial selectivity and selectivity to human voices, is the key to understanding the neural mechanisms of music perception. This specialization is characterized by the extreme sensitivity of neurons in the temporal cortex to the acoustic parameters of complex auditory stimuli such as speech and music. Here we show that this pattern of response is stimulus-specific. We took advantage of the natural speech-repetition stimulus to study the neural responses of anterior and posterior sites in the temporal cortex to the stimulus repetitions and to test whether these responses were stimulus-specific. The anterior sites fired selectively for stimuli that were presented in a new acoustic context and was reduced after long-term exposure to a speech stimulus. In contrast, the posterior sites fired selectively for these same stimuli, and this response was enhanced after long-term exposure to this same stimulus. These two processes could be distinguished by examining the way they operated during adaptation to speech and music. Adaptation to speech selectively reduced the excitatory response in the posterior sites. Adaptation to music, however, revealed a strong inhibitory process in the anterior sites, with no effect on the responses of the posterior sites. These findings support the idea that there are two pathways to the auditory cortex that encode these stimuli and that their sensitivity and relative sensitivity are the most important defining features.1.
