some of the other reviews note that bitdefender free is less powerful than their premium tier. i found the detection to be great, and it did a good job stopping the installation of malware. there was a lot of false positives, though. i'm very careful about what apps i run and don't use third-party launchers for most of my android apps. gmod is a great example, and it's important to enable automatic installs. bitdefender free also has a lot of ads. i don't mind ads on the web, but they add up to a lot on mobile devices. you can see when bitdefender is collecting data by looking at the icon on the home screen. the free version supports phone, tablet and desktop devices running windows, mac and linux. you won't be able to change the filter settings. a filter works like a proactive defense that gets in front of phishing, malware, spyware and other threats as they enter the system. you'll be notified when it's time to update your filters, the first of which is set to scan your entire device as soon as you restart your computer. the rest are synced across a network of your choosing. you can choose to have the program's alerts appear on your desktop's notification area, text them to an e-mail address or have them appear in the notification center on your phone or tablet. premium features premium members are rewarded with a'smart protection' feature. it can detect when your device is being used on an untrusted wi-fi network, and can block access to those networks altogether. it can also alert you if there's a suspicious online search or video link on a web page. email and social networking accounts are whitelisted, so only known contacts can send you links and files. this feature can get a bit trigger-happy, though: a recent update added an option to delete your whitelisted contacts if the wrong contacts uploaded them to your whitelist. 5ec8ef588b
