

At the highest level, the pom.xml file is simply a configuration file for Maven. This file contains Maven information that helps Maven determine what to do when given a set of instructions. It's actually quite simple to understand. The first line is just a comment, telling you that this particular line is a comment. This is interesting to know because comments are ignored by Maven in the processing of the file. If you're going to create many projects, it is a good idea to use a consistent naming convention. For example, let's say you have a project for your company called CompanyName. The name of your company's artifact would be CompanyName and you'd give the artifact CompanyName a version number. For your first artifact, the version would be 1.0. Not all geographical features in Earth are points and lines, and it's important to keep this in mind as you work with the file. A geographic coordinate system is a mathematical system for associating points in space and estimating the distances between them. Earth's default coordinate system is the Earth Ellipsoid or WGS84. When you first import a KMZ file, you see a gray line with the name of the country being displayed in the middle. Click Earth and the map should zoom in. When you zoom to a particular location in your KMZ file, you see features from that location displayed in red, and the area around that location displays in yellow. We can tell this map is using the WGS84 coordinate system because the gray line appears at the bottom left corner. This is the same gray line that appears when you zoom to a location.
