Look in the Device Manager for any yellow and black exclamation marks. If you see any, there may be a conflict, and you may need to have a system tech look at your computer setup. We have an article that explains IRQ conflicts: How do I resolve IRQ conflicts You should try reinstalling the sound card. Use the most updated drivers available from the manufacturer. I tried out the new Battle mode in Shift 2 Unleashed and I must say it's a blast to play and is a great addition to the game. You can play Race, Championship, Career, Score Attack, and Battle modes. The game also features the classic Split Screen mode and online multiplayer. All these modes were taken from Shift 1 with Battle mode added for the sequel. You will also see some familiar cars from the original Need for Speed. Miscellaneous: The download of the game data is pretty small. I don't think it's over 5MB in file size. I loaded it up on my iPhone 3GS and it took just over a minute before the game started. After that, you can go back to the first menu and wait about another minute before you continue the game. Once you start, you won't get any loading screens. You just start driving.

i think there was some talk about having the firmware not show the copyright notices. you could still have an application available for download that would do the basic functionality of the device (letting you send messages, run a web browser, etc). the license notices are just a few lines of code that you could replace by zeros and no harm is done. you don't need to make sure that no one can actually remove or change them. you could have a very simple application that makes the device look like a normal phone and then, while the user is using the device, runs a small application that goes and changes the copyright notices to "safe" values. and after the user has finished using the device, the app restores the "unsafe" copyright notices. this is just an example, of course. it is the same idea as a drm application. you could do that without being in violation of any license. now, if you do that (run the application in the background), then when the user gets the phone back, the copyright notices are displayed properly. you can't save any file from that phone. you can't upload any file to a server. and you can't do anything with the phone at all, it is just a normal phone. no one would believe that you are infringing copyright by doing this. they would think that the phone actually does something. but that is the point of this application: to make the device look like a normal phone. the copyright notice is just a small app. it could be a throw-away app. it could be that all the app does is compare the copyright notices to the value that you want them to be. if it finds that the copyright notices are the value you want, then it runs the rest of the app. if it finds that the copyright notices are not the value you want, then it does nothing. no harm is done. and no one would be able to understand that you were infringing copyright by doing this. however, if you run the application when the phone is on, then people would believe that you were using the phone to infringe copyright. and they could be right. in that case, the safest thing is to leave it as-is. you need to be a little careful, though, because if you do this, then you have to be ready for anyone to come and copy your code. you have to make sure that you have all the self-protection mechanisms in place. maybe you could tell your users that you are not responsible for anything that happens on their phone. that would also prevent you from being responsible if anyone uses your code to infringe copyright. but then you wouldn't be able to trust your users. and it would be up to them to decide what to do. it is kind of a risky business. so, that is why i think that mr radcliffe is correct. he is right that there are risks involved in these things. and when there are risks involved, people are going to try to do anything they can to reduce the risk. and they will try to find ways to make it safe. it is just like people playing games on a real-life racing car. they are going to cheat. they are going to make their car go faster. or they are going to make their car go slower. they are going to do anything they can to win. but, you also need to understand that there are risks involved. you need to know when it is worth it. 5ec8ef588b
