"i think the most immediate impact will be on our business leaders," said mike horst, president and chief executive officer of the greater dallas partnership. "for them, the no. 1 advantage is we're connecting the loop as well as connecting the downtown core. it's very much like building the monorail. it's a real-time, way-before-they-can-do-anything business advantage." dart's rail, which will be limited to 20 miles of track in the city, will be built underneath existing freeway and elevated viaducts and above major roads, passing through existing shopping centers and under major intersections. a route will be chosen based on cost, engineering, public feedback and projected ridership. officials hope dart's groundbreaking rail line will become the catalyst to upgrade the regional economy. the $2.3 billion plan will connect select points around the region, including dallas and fort worth, with the aim of boosting regional connectivity. and because of the breadth of the effort, the jobs it will create will be across a wide spectrum. the engineering company hired to lead the project, parsons corp., expects the project will create 8,500 direct jobs at a ripple effect through the region's economy. other jobs can be created from what horst said could become a booming business district like dart's own eado district station. "if all goes well," he said, "we could get 100,000 jobs in dallas and fort worth." the project will require $750 million to construct and $1.2 billion to operate. dart expects a sizable portion of its funds will be borrowed, though the company will pay off the debt much faster than expected because of the rapid return on investment. dart's project leader said the first phase, which will require $1.4 billion, will be built from 2014 to 2019. after the first part of the line is opened, the next phase, building the second phase, will start in 2025 and cost an additional $500 million. the initial line will be between downtown dallas and union station in downtown fort worth, with plans to eventually expand the route north to the texas medical center, south to dallas love field and eventually to irving's airport and into addison, texas. 5ec8ef588b
