Energy absorption can be measured by various devices but the most common are those which measure the increase in deformation of a sample of elastomeric material from which the energy is absorbed. Many samples of the material under test are used for measuring the energy absorbed, for example, using two identical samples, one before the impact and the other after. These are analyzed by bringing them in contact and determining any differences between the two samples. The possible energy absorption can be measured by the change in the properties of the sample, which can be described as its hardness. The hardness measured can be expressed in various ways, depending on the material, the energy of impact and the application. In this work a hardness measurement as described in ISO 180 is followed. However, other methods can also be used for measuring hardness. Examples of such methods are: conventional methods such as Rockwell or Brinell hardness, Vickers hardness, Knoop, Oschner's methods, dynamometric and ultr
