What's New In?

ProductName: NeoSetupUpdater Description: NeoSetup Updater is an efficient tool for updating your computer automatically.Q: How to get the minimum value from a column and put it in another column How to get the minimum value from a column and put it in another column I have a column called "instructions" and I would like to get the minimum value from this column and put it in a new column called "minimum". So I would like to get the minimum value and add a 1 for each row where the minimum value for "instructions" was found. A: As seen from other answer, if you want minimum value of "instructions" in a new column, use Window functions. Here I am using LAG() function to get the minimum of previous value and compare with current row's value: SELECT rowid, min(instructions) OVER (ORDER BY rowid) AS minval, instructions, COUNT(1) OVER (PARTITION BY instructions) AS count FROM tab; dbfiddle here Q: Git won't find other remote branches I have a Git repository on a remote server. I want to be able to push to this server from another computer on the network. I ran this command to push from the server: git push origin master This ran without error, but it didn't push the master branch to the remote server. Instead, it pushed a new branch called "master" (which has the files from the original master branch). The repository has another branch called "test" which is not pushed, nor am I wanting to be. Why would git push not push "master"? How do I push to the server with my current branches? I've read the following: Git won't push any other branches if there are any untracked files. A: Read the help carefully. The git push command pushes local branches to the remote repository, not any other branch. In your case, you were probably expecting to push the master branch, but git push origin master would push the master branch as well as your new local branch master. If you want to push one branch to a remote repository, you should use: git push origin master In other words, you should push your local branch master to the remote repository origin. A: git push origin master This assumes that the local branch is master, and that there is a remote branch master. If the remote branch you're trying to push is not called master, or doesn't exist, then you
