How about the performance? That can get a bit sticky depending on how you use it. On 1GB of memory, the various browsing modes, the processor hog, the massive viewable area, heavy previewing, and the document management can bog right down. Then there's the option of having the "Developer" mode enabled at all times. That alone can eat up some of your memory. You can certainly convert to each mode as needed. You can launch the preview directly from the program's interface. You can move or resize windows as you like. But you have to be able to do that. But, that said, Photoshop is the most advanced editor there is. There are hundreds of filters, layers, adjustment layers, image adjustments you can perform. Photoshop can even run Apple Aperture plug-ins. So for versatility and performance, Photoshop is unbeatable. One of its pro features is the "Action" mode. Actions are a series of tool and filter presets – much like those you find in FotoMagico's Automator plug-ins. These are useful for creating blindingly fast retrieval and self-locking creation of one or more files. The same applies to camera raw or documented files, one of those "Lightroom presets" could apply to the same file. Color control can be extremely tricky. Depending on the levels of your files, they may or may not lose detail in the color. Adobe has a great "Camera Raw" plug-in for that. But it's not the only free plug-in, and it's limits are rather difficult to control. The ColorMatch function in Photoshop will match anything you ask it to in any of the available swatches, but you can't specify the overall color. That's up to you. This is handy for "quick and dirty" matching or for getting color matched between files.
