Again, this is likely to change with any future version of Photoshop. But for now, I think this release hits many of my needs. Though I do not use it as the primary program, Lightroom 5 definitely makes it easier for me to use Photoshop for certain tasks. I suppose that's largely thanks to Amazon's deal with Adobe to allow iPad owners to buy a subscription and have access on any device – including PCs. The Professional version of the program offers better and faster performance. One of the most welcomed additions is the GPU Accelerator. Adobe Photoshop Elements (the non-Pro version) still has the GPU Accelerator option, but it doesn't provide any performance gains. I use GPU acceleration so that I can have better performance when working with high-resolution photos. It also enables this program to color correct more accurately as well as enabling me to get better results by applying sharpness to a selection. Adobe's DNG Converter also supports DNG files that have been opened in a digital photography folder. Another improvement, as are many of these updates, is based on customer feedback. Photoshop has been evolving rapidly and these new features are a direct result of what the community has suggested. To a large extent, Photoshop has moved towards being a more robust product that can accomplish complex tasks. For instance, it no longer requires Photoshop CS2 or higher to create eye Droppers or Smart Brushes. You no longer need to have a Graphics tablet and stylus.
