Haddad has worked extensively with mobile developers, and he decided to use himself as a case study. He spent an entire day entering information about his work processes into his terminal app, pulling it together into a consolidated document. He tested his document on several phones and tablets, and worked out how best to structure that information so it could be viewed from any device.
READ MORE Adobe says that the process of setting up a project for collaborative work is 90 minutes long, but Haddad had to develop a minimum of 20 hours of setup. He actually spent a full day to prepare—not just the mobile setup, but also a comprehensive description of his day-to-day processes. He usually uses a computer to do that work—but this time he was image-capturing himself using an iPad—and captured a reasonable description of his processes, including screenshots for as he worked. He sent all of it to his Apple developers. By the time he was ready to work, his team had read his document, and the one thing they did was to address inconsistencies and inconsistencies to ensure that mobile and desktop users saw the same thing. In doing so, they resolved about five separate projects they were working on together. I would like to be more excited about the improvements in Photoshop CS4. To be honest, although the new feature set and the speed of the operation were pleasantly surprising, that was not the case for the new version. I recommend Lightroom 3 largely because it may be the last free *nix program to co-exist with Photoshop, at least for a long while. The announcement of free Adobe CC software for 2012 is a political shot across Adobe's bow. The next step for Lightroom 4 will most likely be to compete with Photoshop CS6, assuming that Adobe can pull it off. Adobe has already scheduled an announcement for October that will coincide with the release of Creative Suite 6, which could be a big week in the whole Adobe/Apple rapprochement.
