Adobe has given us a number of reasons as to why Lightroom 6 is not released as the latest iteration of Lightroom 5. These include creating a stable and robust product that doesn't break backwards compatibility, a company valuation coinciding with the transition to CS6 from CC then CS5, and the need to bring in new hires who likely don't have previous experience in the Lightroom family. While I feel the revised interface is much easier to use, the program still can get monotonously repetitive. If you import a lot of images, Lightroom will quickly become boring because of automatic checking of formats and processing, and you won't be able to get to the images you want to work with very easily. Lightroom 6 will need to find a balance between creating a streamlined user interface and allowing the basic functionality of the program to remain intact. Perhaps you got a chance to check out the latest version of Lightroom and just loved it. There isn't a good reason to throw away Lightroom 5, considering that it can still export to TIFF, use external cameras and others of its old features. Rather than thinking about a downgrade, I would try and find what you like in the latest version. I would, however, advise you to export your images to Lightroom's native RAW format sooner rather than later. Adobe has toned down the effects a bit, but if you are being pressured into making a decision on what is better, then I would seriously consider whether RAW is important to you. There appears to be some sense of improvement, however slight, if you can find some areas where Lightroom continued to improve.
