Wouldn't a dedicated Photoshop plugin for Lightroom do the trick? Of course, this way you would need both software packages, but it might be an elegant way to improve things in future. I personally can't make the change yet, as I am on Snow Leopard with only 10.6.4 build installed. Bear in mind that the PS plugin for Lightroom is currently available only for the 64-bit version of CS6. I will return with an update when I get a recent build. The program mostly shines with its amazing photography integration, its very well designed user interface and its amazing image library in the form of Lightroom, and the amazing level of integration with the rest of the Creative Cloud Pack. Lightroom also sports a very powerful batch processing options, even helping you touch up certain flaws in your photography. Photographers who are used to post-processing their photos in Photoshop often find that Lightroom can be quite a bit easier. Curiously, Lightroom also makes photo printing from the library a breeze, with the ability to create PDFs quickly. It is considered to be a really powerful tool to work with RAW files. On the downside, I personally feel that Lightroom can be somewhat complicated if you don't know the basics. I can also imagine that some people may find the program to be rather bloated for their own workflows. Learning curve is a little bit steep, but I am not saying that it cannot be done. Lightroom does have a learning curve, though, and sometimes it does feel that way.

Maier (pronounced May) would visit the streets of Chicago, often at night, recording street life - friends and strangers - in remarkable street photographs that went unsold in her lifetime, and only came to light in the 1960s. Photoshop is also super powerful when it comes to editing and converting (including via a new imaging switch). However, as with many programs, it is lacking in some key areas such as color tools, including a lack of extensive editing of colors and gradients.
